"Soclety has the soft-drink habit to an injurious degree," said a West End matron as she gave to me a clear, sparkling glass of ice water. "It may be true that the American soda fountain is the greatest enemy of alcoholism, but it is also tro that the person who cultivates a pampered appetite for soft drinks is guilty of resorts to the use of stronger ones, That most Americans train themselves to feel thirsty often when not really so is a fact too little appreclated." "I have always heard the Americans ac cused of not drinking enough," said a young society girl. DRINK THEORY ABUSED.

"The theory that one cannot drink to much water is greatly abused," said the matron. "Free drinking and frequent flushing of the system are excellent practices, but the enormous quantities of water drunk by many persons disarranges the systemic equilibrium and predisposes to disease. That we are disposed to drink whenever we feel even slightly thirsty, after having thus trained ourselves, is perhaps responsible for most of the interest which centers in the subject of summer drinks, both alcoholic and nonalcoholic.

"Our grandfathers with their limited resources, made their acid drinks from vine gar, the expressed juice of currants, goose berries, cranberries, green grapes and from the young stems and leaves of the grape and from sumac fruits. Although we may now employ a much greater variety of fruit sirups, we rely chiefly upon lemonade, either made directly from the fresh juice of lemons or limes, or from their extracted citric acid. The use of the fresh fruit is preferable, and that of the lime is richer in acid, besides being the finer flavored. "The relative portions of sugar and acid are determined chiefly by individual taste, but it is well to remember that a sparing use of sugar is prudent. Sugar not only promotes the drink habit, but tend toward indigestion by undergoing factic fermentation in the stomach, resulting in heartburn. It moreover disguises acidity and thus encourages the freer use of the acid, which is itself distinctly injurious, if over-used, to the stomach functions, OAT MEAL IN WATER.

"The farmer, when serving his farm hands during the excessive heated period, stirs in the water a couple of handsful of finely chopped out meal. The mixture is acidulated with vinegar and sweetened to the taste, and its thirst-relieving properties are much greater than those of an equal amount of clear water. In the household the same result can be secured more elegantly by the addition of gun
